Prime Minister Kyriakos Mitsotakis called on Greek people Saturday to enter into a Progress and Prosperity Pact that will place the country into a stronger position into the 2030s.

He emphasized medium-term goals – specifically, over the next four years – but did not neglect immediate measures designed to benefit a good chunk of the electorate – professionals, small-business owners, the young, pensioners and others – that he will face in a few months time, as he attempts to win a rare third consecutive term.

At the start of his keynote speech at the Thessaloniki International Fair, Mitsotakis mentioned it was the eighth consecutive year he was taking the podium; he felt no need to add, and the last before the next national election a few months from now.
