

HYPOCRITICAL STATEMENT BY GREEK MFA REGARDING RECENT MUFTI APPOINTMENTS IN İSKEÇE (XANTHI) AND GÜMÜLCİNE (KOMOTINI)

Introduction

Even though the Turkish Muslim Minority in Western Thrace has the right to elect its own mufti, a demand they have been voicing for years, and notwithstanding European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) decisions that have repeatedly found such practices of the Greek governments appointments in violation of freedom of religion and association, the Greek government has recently made new appointments to the muftiate of İskeçe and Gümülcine. According to a report by Anadolu Agency, a Presidential Decree regarding these appointments has been published in the Official Gazette of Greece. Under the decree, which has now come into effect, Bilal Kara Halil, formerly the appointed deputy mufti of İskeçe, has been appointed as the Mufti of Gümülcine. In contrast, Şükrü Şerif Damatoğlu, who has been serving as a religious official in İstanköy (Kos), has been appointed as the Mufti of İskeçe. It was stated in the decrees that both muftis will serve a five-year term, which may be renewed once. [1] A link to the page in the Official Gazette of Greece (issue no. 1662, dated October 21, 2026) where the respective decrees were published, along with an English translation of the portions of these decrees concerning Gümülcine and İskeçe is provided in the footnote below to facilitate future academic research on the subject.[2]

The Legal Framework of the Religious Rights of the Turkish-Muslim Minority in Western Thrace, Dating Back to 1913

As we have in numerous AVİM commentaries/analyses examined in detail, in recent years, Greek state intervention in the religious leadership of the Turkish minority has intensified, revealing a systematic approach to undermining the autonomy preserved by the Lausanne Treaty. Since the 1991 legislative reforms, Athens has unilaterally shifted from community-based election of muftis to a top-down system in which the state appoints religious leaders, disregarding both the historic practice and the explicit wishes of the local Turkish population. This policy, criticized in international reports and legal scholarship, directly contradicts the spirit and letter of Articles 37 □□□ of the Lausanne Treaty, which safeguard minority religious self-governance.[3] In this context, the articles of the Treaty of Lausanne mentioned are not the only international legal framework on this issue. For example, the 1913 Athens Agreement between Greece and the Ottoman Empire serves as an additional foundational legal framework for the religious autonomy of the Turkish minority. Article 11 of this agreement unequivocally secures the right of Muslim communities in Greece to freely elect their religious leaders, supervise religious foundations, and administer their own religious education. The said Article 11 stipulates that The muftis, each within his own community, shall be elected by Mussulman electors. [4]

Striking Anomaly in Greek Law 4964/2022 Entitled Provisions for the simplification of environmental licensing, the establishment of a framework for the development of Offshore Wind Farms

As an observant reader might have noticed, the decree mentioned in the footnote regarding Greeces recent appointments of so-called "muftis cites a law titled "Provisions for the simplification of environmental licensing, the establishment of a framework for the development of Offshore Wind Farms." In this context, the decree states that these appointments were made pursuant to Section C of Part B of this curiously titled law. The section heading is interestingly "Position and Status of Muftis and Acting Muftis in Thrace." [5]

There is no doubt that the appointment and status of Muftis in Western Thrace are highly sensitive political and domestic issues involving delicate relations with Türkiye and international human rights watchdogs. The legislators likely anticipated that introducing a separate bill titled "Appointment and Regulation of Islamic Muftis" would inevitably trigger intense media scrutiny, prolonged parliamentary debate, and a sharp reaction from both the Turkish Muslim minority and Türkiye itself. Consequently, they most likely chose to bury these provisions deep within a comprehensive bill focused on urgent economic and ecological issues. By doing so, they most likely aimed to ensure the matter would go largely unnoticed, while simultaneously minimizing political and media-driven controversy.

It would not be unfair to say that this undemocratic "stealth strategy" followed by Greece in adopting the law in question reflects, to say the least, a hypocritical stance that deliberately obscures significant minority-rights changes from robust public debate.

What do the brief content and discourse analyses of the statements issued by the Turkish and Greek Ministries of Foreign Affairs on this subject reveal?

Turkish MFAs 24 October 2026 statement entitled Greeces Policies Toward the Muftis of the Turkish Minority in Western Thrace essentially draws attention to the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Turkish Muslim Minority in Western Thrace and underlines that Greece continues to disregard these rights guaranteed under the Lausanne Peace Treaty and international agreements, by appointing so-called muftis in Komotini and Xanthi.[6] It draws attention to the fact that the institution of the Mufti is an integral part of the religious, social, and cultural identity of the Turkish Minority in Western Thrace. The statement underlines that by refusing to recognize the Muftis elected by the Turkish Minority in Western Thrace, an official minority in the country, Greece is ignoring the Minoritys will and religious freedom, hereby once again revealing its distorted perspective on fundamental human rights. The Ministry, at the end of the statement, politely calls on Greek authorities to recognize the legitimate Muftis elected by the Minority and to put an end to their attempts to impose appointed muftis.

Now, let us also look at the statement from the Greek Foreign Ministry on the matter. Greek MFA firstly states that The 1923 Treaty of Lausanne, which governs the legal status of the Muslim Minority in Thrace, is clear: it is a religious minority. Its character cannot be challenged or redefined at will. The Muslim Minority in Thrace comprises Greek citizens and is an integral part of Greek society. Through Law 4964/2022, Greece established a modern and democratic process for the selection of Muftis, involving members of the Minority itself □□□□□□□□□□ women □□□□□□□□ enhancing transparency and ensuring full respect for religious freedom. The statement subsequently includes exactly the following remarks:

> It is, to say the least, hypocritical for Türkiye to lecture Greece on religious freedom and respect for human rights, all the more so given that, in Türkiye itself, Muftis are appointed by the state. For such admonitions to be credible, there must, first and foremost, be consistency between words and actions. [7]

The statement further notes that while the free practice of religious belief is a fundamental right, this right cannot be invoked selectively, nor can it be used as a pretext for interfering in the internal affairs of a sovereign state. Furthermore, it is asserted that "Greece, as a European state governed by the rule of law - fully committed to the principles of equality before the law and equal citizenship - protects the rights of all its citizens, while upholding international law in its entirety.

In this context, an objective assessment suggests that while the statement from the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs is drafted in diplomatic language officially recording Türkiyes position on the matter and reflecting it professionally, the statement from the Greek Ministry of Foreign Affairs, devoid of diplomatic finesse, conveys an unbalanced, nervous tone, ventures into the troubled waters of harsh verbal confrontation, and appears to be provocative bullying in nature. It is fair to say that this statement employs the same kind of provocative and disrespectful language frequently seen in recent remarks from Greece both at an institutional level and through political figures who ought to act with a sense of responsibility. It is worth bearing in mind that this stance is a dangerous and irresponsible approach.

Conclusion

One of the most significant issues facing the Turkish-Muslim minority in Western Thrace is the appointment of muftis. Greece has consistently avoided reaching an equitable solution to this long-standing problem, choosing instead to disregard documents that carry international legal validity. The recent appointments to the Muftiate of Gümülcine and İskeçe demonstrate once again that the demands and expectations of the Turkish Muslim minority are being ignored. This is not merely an administrative matter falling solely within Greeces domestic jurisdiction; rather, it is a fundamental issue directly linked to the religious identity of the Turkish Muslim minority in Western Thrace, their collective will, and their right to determine their own religious leaders free from such anti-democratic practices. It is highly advisable for the Greek government to return to the past practice of letting the Turkish minority select their religious leaders instead of electing themselves. The adoption of which could remove at least one contentious issue between the two countries.

These rights are rooted in existing international legal instruments. Through a series of persistent faits accomplis, Greece continues to violate the rights of the Turkish-Muslim minority in Western Thrace.

In the aforementioned statement, the Greek Ministry of Foreign Affairs states that a committee selects candidates and that appointments are made through a democratic process facilitated by that body. It is understood that this body is the one established under Article 154 of Law 4964/2022, titled "Establishment of an Advisory Committee." A closer examination of this article reveals that the committee in question is an artificial, arbitrarily constructed entity. One would have to be quite naive to argue that such a body is "modern and democratic."

Greeces persistent violation of the rights of the Turkish-Muslim minority in Western Thrace □□□□□□□□□□□□ regarding education and religious matters □□□□□□□□□□ causes unease among the Turkish public.[8] It is time for the Greek authorities to end their unacceptable conduct towards the Turkish minority in Greece in respect of Human rights
